Can anyone give me an explanation about the pros and cons? Or a link to an article that I can read? Thanks A: Both methods are effective, but they have their advantages. An advantage of using string resources is that you can easily edit the icons through the graphical editor of Android Studio. If you need to make a change to the icon, you just need to create a new string resource with the new icon and reference that icon in your code. Drawable resources, on the other hand, are much more difficult to edit graphically, in the graphical editor and in code. If you have different variants of the same icon and the same icon with a different color you may be unable to edit one icon using the other methods. The only real concern with using drawable resources is if you are going to use them in a non-app packaged file. A lot of the time you would use the same resource file for both, but, if you change a drawable resource for a different purpose, the default name of the drawable will change in XML (in a base Android package). For example, if you were changing a drawable resource for an alert dialog, it would change the alert_* drawable resource in your default Android package. If you were adding multiple variants of the same icon, they would have different names in the default package and you would end up
