English Translation - Learn this game like never before! In this Standard 52 card variation of the popular French card game, et noir, French for 'black', you're dealt four cards that you can put in a row (hence the name) face-down. You then put the rest of your cards face-down in the middle of the table. The other player, called the dealer, then gets two cards and chooses any one of them to play face-up. The loser must then put his/her two cards in the row, and the game continues as before. From a mathematical standpoint, you are showing three cards face-up. You are saying, "Here are my three best cards and my two others". To show your hand, you must show your three best cards in a row. You say, "I will show my three best cards face-up". Please Note: The information on this web site is written in "English" and is not intended for non-English speaking countries. In this game, you are dealt a number of cards that you must put face-down in a line. You then remove the rest of your cards. Then you must show your own cards and then the other player's cards. You say "I will show my cards". The person with the highest card wins the game. When showing your hand of cards, it is more convenient to show your cards from the top down rather than bottom up. For example, if you are dealt a two of spades and a three of hearts, it is more convenient to show your hand from the bottom up: "I will show my spades, then my hearts". This is because the most likely sequence of events is that the other player will first look at your spades and then your hearts. There are two versions of this game: et noir and et blanc. The French name of this game is made up of two words: "Et" and "Blanc". "Et" refers to the fact that the game is played with four cards (or hands). The remaining 52 cards are used to "fill in" for the other player. "Blanc" refers to the fact that the players are dealt face-down cards. The other player will get two of his/her face-up cards to play with. "Et noir" refers to the fact that the person who plays with two face-up cards is the loser 82157476af
